LABOR in MICHIGAN
Learning from the Past & Moving Toward the Future

THEN & NOW:
Left, women at the Goody's Nut Shop in Detroit occupy their store during a wave of sit-down strikes in 1937.

Today, hundreds of young Detroiters are demanding a higher minimum wage, demonstrating in front of fast-food restaurants and on downtown streets, and for a sustainable future with Green Union jobs.

By STEVE BLANCHARD
For more than a century, Michigan workers have built movements to improve their lives. From mass protests demanding an eight-hour workday, to strikes by streetcar drivers, copper miners, furniture workers, and others, the labor movement inspired and energized generations of working.
